accelerated cosmological expansion. However it is impossible to apply the similar analysis to some of them because the theory is not sufficiently specified - only a modification of the Friedmann equations is suggested but no modified action which would allow to derive equations in general case was presented [9]-[11].

The same theories can also be used to account for the rapid inflationary expansion at the earliest time of creation, and predict the future cosmic expansion rate. The widely accepted model of our cosmos is that it began from a Big Bang event some 13.7 billion years ago from a single point source.

the properties of SN 1006 remnant. Calculated expansion law and radio-, X-ray and-ray emission produced in SN 1006 by accelerated CRs very well agree with the experiment. The β -decay γ -rays, generated by the nuclear CR component, and IC-rays, generated by CR electrons in the inverse Compton (IC) process on cosmic microwave background, give roughly equal contribution in the observed TeV-ray flux of SN 1006.
